In Part I of this article, published in the last edition of ARIAS Quarterly, we endeavored to examine the outer limits of arbitrators' authority to perform certain traditionally judicial acts in the context of an industry arbitration. The first installment described the principal sources of arbitral authority in the United States and abroad — the Federal Arbitration Act ("FAA"), state law (the Uniform Arbitration Act ("UAA") or Revised UAA ("RUAA")), international law (the "UNCITRAL rules"), and various commercial rules, including those promulgated by the American Arbitration Association ("AAA Rules") and ARIAS (the "ARIAS Practical Guide") — and whether these principles confer on arbitrators the power to award multiple damages. This installment advances the analysis by examining the extent of an arbitrator's power to order injunctive relief, exercise subpoena powers, and issue confidentiality orders, and it analyzes the practical challenges faced by arbitrators who exercise those powers.

I. FIVE (QUASI-) JUDICIAL FUNCTIONS

A. Interim Relief/Pre-Hearing Security

An arbitrator's authority to grant injunctive relief remains an unsettled issue, which the courts continue to address on a case-by-case basis. See Gilmer v. Interstate/Johnson Lane Corp., 500 U.S. 20, 32 (1991) (if permitted under the terms of the parties' arbitration agreement, an arbitrator may order injunctive relief).¹ In the reinsurance context, when the financial condition of one party is precarious or unknown, relief is generally requested in the form of a motion seeking pre-hearing security. In these financially troubled times, such requests have begun to proliferate based — not only on the respondent's condition, but also — on perceptions of vulnerability associated with their business partners and the market(s) in which they operate. The scope of a panel's authority to issue security awards must be defined, so that parties know whether a court will likely enforce them. This is particularly true when a party seeks to attach its adversary's assets. This section generally describes the sources of an arbitrator's authority to award interim relief — with emphasis on requests for pre-hearing security.

1. Sources of Authority

If a contract expressly authorizes arbitrators to award interim relief, the courts will generally enforce the award. See, e.g., Mastrobucchi v. Shearson Lehman Hutton, Inc., 514 U.S. 52, 57 (1995) ("courts are bound to interpret contracts in accordance with the expressed intentions of the parties"). If the relevant contract is silent with respect to interim relief, however, the panel may look elsewhere for guidance.

Although the FAA and UAA are silent on the issue, the RUAA expressly states that an "arbitrator may issue such orders for provisional remedies, including interim awards, as the arbitrator finds necessary ... to promote the fair and expeditious resolution of the controversy, to the same extent and under the same condition as if the controversy were the subject of a civil action." See Section 8(b). There is, however, no express reference to "security motions."

Article 26 of the UNCITRAL rules also provides for broad interim relief, which expressly includes security orders. It says, in pertinent part:

INTERIM MEASURES OF PROTECTION

(1) At the request of either party, the arbitral tribunal may take any interim measures it deems necessary in respect of the subject-matter of the dispute, including measures for the conservation of the goods forming the subject-matter in dispute, such as ordering their deposit with a third person or the sale of perishable goods.

(2) Such interim measures may be established in the form of an interim award. The arbitral tribunal shall be entitled to require security for the costs of such measures.

(3) A request for interim measures addressed by any party to a judicial authority shall not be deemed incompatible with the agreement to arbitrate, or as a waiver of that agreement.

Id. (Emphasis supplied).

Interim relief is also expressly authorized by a few of the private commercial codes. For example, the ARIAS Practical Guide states, in Chapter 4.4, that “[t]he Panel has the authority to enter interim awards in appropriate cases.” The ARIAS Guidelines also contain a sample form Pre-Hearing Security Order, and they note that security orders are commonly utilized in appropriate cases. The AAA Commercial Arbitration Rules arm panel members with even broader authority:

(a) The arbitrator may take whatever interim measures he or she deems necessary, including injunctive relief and measures for the protection or conservation of property and disposition of perishable goods.

(b) Such interim measures may take the form of an interim award, and the arbitrator may require security for the costs of such measures.

Id. at R-34 (emphasis supplied). The broad language of the AAA Rules articulates the role of interim measures in maintaining the status quo, and it also provides specific examples of authorized forms of relief. The AAA Rules add that an “arbitrator may grant any remedy or relief that the arbitrator deems just and equitable and within the scope of the agreement of the parties, including, but not limited to, specific performance of a contract.” R-43(a).

Finally, procedural guidelines recommended by industry professionals expressly authorize panel members to award interim relief, concluding that the decision to do so is “almost

To the Editor...

Reinsurance arbitrators are generally interested in the location of an arbitration proceeding only in the context of making travel plans or deciding which jurisdiction’s law will apply. For the lawyers involved, however, the issues are a little more complex, including the issue of whether or not he or she is engaging in the unlicensed practice of law. While most jurisdictions do not consider the participation in an arbitration proceeding in a state where the lawyer is not admitted to be the unlicensed practice of law, there are some exceptions.

The Committee on Arbitration of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York prepared an excellent paper recently that has been published in the Bar Association’s publication, The Record, entitled “Unauthorized Practice of Law and the Representation of Parties in Arbitrations in New York by Lawyers Not Licensed to Practice in New York.” Although focused on New York, it includes an excellent state-by-state summary of the law in each jurisdiction, which might be of significant interest to the lawyer members of ARIAS. The article can be accessed from the Bar Association’s web site (2008 Issue 3, at p. 700) at: <http://www.nycbar.org/Publications/THERECORD.htm>.

exclusively within the discretion of the panel of arbitrators.” See RAA Procedures at §8.1 (“A Panel may issue orders for interim relief, including pre-award security.”).

2. Pre-Judgment Security and The Courts

Given the silence of the FAA and UAA — and the failure of many jurisdictions to adopt the RUA — the question whether a panel has authority to grant injunctive relief in arbitrations not governed by commercial rules (absent express authorization from the parties’ arbitration agreement) remains one for the courts. The current weight of judicial authority — and industry practice — supports an arbitrator’s discretion to award equitable relief, including pre-hearing security orders.

In general, this broad discretion to preserve the status quo is rooted in a pragmatic recognition of the parties’ limited ability to enumerate every possible problem (and the related undertakings) a panel may need to address in the future. E.g., Yasuda Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Continental Cas. Co., 37 F.3d 345 (7th Cir. 1994). The arbitration clauses found in older reinsurance contracts often specify without elaboration, for example, that the arbitrators are “free from all judicial formalities.” Faced with this kind of omnibus honorable engagement provision, a number of courts have construed it as a talisman meaning “inherent authority.” As one court said:

Courts in this Circuit have firmly established the principle that arbitrators operating pursuant to [honorable engagement clauses] have the authority to order interim relief in order to prevent their final award from becoming meaningless.

British Ins. Co. of Cayman v. Water Street Ins. Co., 93 F. Supp.2d 506, 516 (S.D.N.Y. 2000) (citations omitted); see also Forum Ins. Co. v. First Horizon Ins. Co., 1989 WL 65041, at *3 (N.D. Ill. June 8, 1989) (panel had “inherent power, aside from any treaty, to order ... security”). More broadly, the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals has explained the need for flexible interpretation of a panel’s inherent powers:

[W]e would be remiss if we did not emphasize how important a wide range of remedies is to successful arbitration. Although parties to arbitration agreements may not always articulate specific remedies, that does not mean remedies are not available. If an enumeration of remedies were necessary, in many “cases the arbitrator would be powerless to impose any remedy, and that would not be correct. Since the arbitrator ‘derives all his powers from the agreement, the agreement must implicitly grant him remedial powers when there is no grant.’”

Yasuda, 37 F.3d at 351 (citations omitted).² In other words, if arbitrators are to be charged with stewardship over this form of adjudicative process, then the courts will not deprive them of the tools needed to run it and to deliver meaningful remedies, even if those powers need to be implied in the parties’ agreement.

3. The Unauthorized Insurers’ Process Act

Although the import of state Unauthorized Insurers Process Acts (the “UIPA”) on the arbitration process is debatable, parties in arbitration have argued from time to time that the UIPA bears, in certain circumstances, on a panel’s authority to issue security. The UIPA is a model statute adopted, in varying forms, by all fifty states.³ It provides, among other things, that pre-appearance security is required from unauthorized insurers before they may file a pleading in court. A common iteration of that restriction provides:

Before any unauthorized foreign or alien insurer files any pleading in any proceeding against it, it shall either: (A) deposit with the clerk of the court in which the proceeding is pending, cash or securities ... sufficient to secure payment of any final judgment which may be rendered in the proceeding...

N.Y. Ins. Law at §1213(c) (emphasis supplied); see also, e.g., Del. Code Ann. tit. 18 at §2107(a); Me. Rev. Stat. Ann. tit. 24-A at §2107(1); Mass. Gen. Laws Ch. 175B at §3(a). In some states, reinsurers are exempted from the security requirement, if they “designat[e] the commissioner of insurance or his successor in office [as the reinsurer’s] true and lawful attorney upon whom may be served all lawful process in any action, suit or proceeding instituted.” See, e.g., Del. Code Ann. tit. 18 at §2107; Me.

There is an ongoing debate over the applicability of these statutes, if any, to industry arbitration. On one hand, the statutes specifically point to judicial proceedings — as opposed to arbitrations — in their reference to a “filing” with the “clerk of the court” and by noting that “the court” may dispense with security orders in certain circumstances. Others argue, however, that the statutes may be applied, if only by analogy, to the arbitration context, because state legislatures clearly recognized — when they adopted the UIPA — that pre-hearing security was essential to protect their citizens in disputes involving foreign insurers. See N.Y. Ins. Law at §1213(a) (“The legislature declares that it is a subject of concern that many residents of this state hold policies of insurance issued or delivered in this state by insurers while not authorized to do business in this state”).⁴

At least one court faced with this issue has held that the New York UIPA did not undermine or otherwise affect an arbitration panel’s authority to order pre-award security. See British Ins. Co. of Cayman v. Water Street Ins. Co., 93 F. Supp.2d 506 (S.D.N.Y. 2000); see also General Reinsurance Corp. v. Underwriting Members of Lloyd’s, No. 103047/02, at 6, 10 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. Oct. 8, 2002) (when an arbitrating party petitioned the court to obtain pre-hearing security under the New York UIPA, the court denied the petition because the UIPA does not necessarily apply to arbitrations, and “the question of whether petitioner is entitled to security should rest with the arbitration panel”). Still, because the language of each state statute varies, each one must be examined individually in order to determine whether it arguably addresses an arbitrator’s ability to manage the subject proceeding and to award pre-hearing security.

In short, arbitrators are generally authorized to order injunctive relief. If, however, the proceedings are not governed by a source of authority expressly arrogating this authority to the panel, and the parties’ arbitration agreement is silent on the subject of injunctive relief, a panel’s authority to award injunctive relief may be (and, it sometimes is) subject to dispute.

B. Subpoena Power

As a general matter, and within reason, an arbitration panel may establish the scope of discovery in a reinsurance arbitration, subject to any agreement between the parties. In the absence of statutory authority, however, neither the parties nor the arbitrators control the flow of information from third parties. See Matter of the Arbitration between Integrity Ins. Co. v. Am. Centennial Ins. Co., 885 F. Supp. 69, 71 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (non-parties “never bargained for or voluntarily agreed to participate in an arbitration”). Because relevant information is often in the possession of non-parties to a reinsurance arbitration — including brokers, MGA’s, and other participants in the disputed reinsurance program — the ability of a panel to issue deposition or document subpoenas may be critical to its final disposition.

Arbitral authority to subpoena non-parties must be found in sources extrinsic to the contract that launched the arbitration and enabled the arbitrators. See, e.g., Hay Group, Inc. v. E.B.S. Acquisition Corp., 360 F.3d 404, 406 (3d Cir. 2004) (“[a]n arbitrator’s authority over parties that are not contractually bound by the arbitration agreement is strictly limited to that granted by the Federal Arbitration Act”); National Broadcasting Co., Inc. v. Bear Stearns & Co., 165 F.3d 184, 187 (2d Cir. 1999) (“If discovery were to be obtained from ... Third Parties ... the authority to compel their participation would have to be found in a source other than the parties’ arbitration agreement”).⁵ Because reinsurance contracts often involve risks and cedents located in different states, most reinsurance contracts are interpreted according to the FAA, absent the parties’ selection of a specified state’s law. Under the FAA, “arbitrators ... may summon in writing any person to attend before them or any of them as a witness and in a proper case to bring with him or them any book, record, document, or paper which may be deemed material as evidence in the case.” Id. at §7 (emphasis supplied). The UAA,⁶ RUAA,⁷ the UNCITRAL rules,⁸ and the AAA Rules⁹ each authorize some form of arbitral subpoena power.

The FAA, UAA and RUAA allow panels to compel attendance of non-parties at a hearing, but they do not directly address the scope of a panel’s power to order pre-hearing discovery from third parties. Similarly, although AAA Rule 31(d) may be interpreted to authorize pre-hearing discovery from non-parties, if a non-party refuses to comply with the subpoena, the party seeking discovery must enforce the subpoena in court. The federal circuits called upon to consider the issue are split — some permit discovery subpoenas to be issued; some require a showing of “special need”; and, a third group has ruled out arbitral discovery subpoenas altogether. Moreover, there is no consensus as to whether these subpoenas may be used to compel the appearance of deponents or, in the alternative, whether they may be used only to obtain documents.

A recent decision by the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, however, may signal “an ‘emerging rule’ that [an] arbitrator’s subpoena authority under FAA § 7 does not include the authority to subpoena nonparties or third parties for pre-hearing discovery.” Life Receivables Trust v. Syndicate 102 at Lloyd’s of London, No. 07-1197, 2008 WL 4978550 (2d Cir. Nov. 25, 2008) (citation omitted).

1. Pre-Hearing Discovery Not Allowed

In adopting reasoning previously applied by the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, the Life Receivables court took a strict constructionist view of the FAA and staked the outer bounds of permissible, non-party discovery in arbitrations governed by the FAA. See id.; see also Hay Group, Inc. v. E.B.S. Acquisition Corp., 360 F.3d 404 (3d Cir. 2004). In Hay Group, the Third Circuit held that Section 7 of the FAA (“Section 7”) did not authorize a panel to order pre-hearing document production from non-parties. See Hay Group, 360 F.3d at 407. In reversing the federal trial court’s ruling below, the Court in Hay Group held that “Section 7’s language unambiguously restricts an arbitrator’s subpoena power to situations in which the non-party has been called to appear in the physical presence of the arbitrator and to hand over the

For these reasons, confidentiality provisions are viewed by some as an essential component to the formula that has made arbitration the principal means of resolving formal reinsurance disputes. In fact, some practitioners argue that confidentiality should be considered an implied term of reinsurance agreements (especially older contracts), even if it is not expressly set forth in the parties' contract.

documents at that time.” Id. at 407; see also Integrity Ins. Co., v. Am. Centennial Ins. Co., 885 F. Supp. 69, 72-73 (S.D.N.Y. 1995) (arbitrators were free to order pre-hearing document discovery, but had no power to issue deposition subpoenas, because the burden was too high for non-parties who “never bargained for or voluntarily agreed to participate in the arbitration”).

Applying the same reasoning, the Life Receivables court strictly construed the language of the FAA, noting that “[w]hen a statute’s language is clear, our only role is to enforce that language according to its terms.” Life Receivables, 2008 WL 4978550, at *5 (citations omitted). Because Section 7 only permits document discovery from non-parties if they appear before members of the panel, the court concluded that the FAA does not authorize arbitrators to compel pre-hearing document discovery from non-parties. As a result, if an arbitrator were to issue a third-party subpoena, the subpoena likely would not be enforced by a court in the Second Circuit.

Although arbitrators may be limited in their ability to compel discovery from non-parties, they are not powerless. In fact, the Life Receivables court expressly noted that Section 7 of the FAA is not restricted to merits hearings — a panel could order a witness to appear at a preliminary hearing with the requested documents in hand. See id. at *6.¹⁰ Of course, such orders sometimes induce non-party witnesses to produce their documents, in order to avoid the inconvenience of appearing in person. Id. At a minimum, the limitations of Section 7 should cause both parties and arbitrators to consider more closely the scope of discovery requests and their relevance to the issues in dispute. See id. In this respect, the FAA provides some measure of control on the elephantine expansion of arbitration proceedings.

2. Pre-Hearing Discovery Permitted

In contrast to these more recent decisions, the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals ruled, in 1999, that a panel could compel not only a third party’s attendance at an evidentiary hearing, but also pre-hearing production of documents from non-parties. Am. Fed’n of Television and Radio Artists v. TJBK TV, 164 F.3d 1004, 1009 (6th Cir. 1999). The court determined that the FAA’s authorization of document subpoenas for production at an evidentiary hearing “implicitly include[s] the authority to compel the production of documents for inspection by a party prior to the hearing.” A similar rationale has been employed by courts with respect to an arbitrator’s authority to issue deposition subpoenas. See Amgen Inc. v. Kidney Ctr. of Delaware County, Ltd., 879 F. Supp. 878 (N.D. Ill. 1995). Like the court in American Federation, the Amgen court held that the FAA-granted authority to compel testimony at a hearing also included the power to compel testimony prior to an evidentiary hearing.

In 2000, the Eighth Circuit offered a more nuanced approach to the problem of arbitral subpoenas to produce documents. Security Life Ins. Co. of Am. v. Duncanson & Holt Inc., 228 F.3d 865, 870-71 (8th Cir. 2000). In Security Life, the Court paid special attention to the non-party’s involvement in the issues under review. It held that an arbitrator could compel pre-hearing discovery of a non-party who was “not a mere bystander pulled into [a] matter arbitrarily, but is a party to the contract that is the root of the dispute, and is therefore integrally related to the underlying arbitration, [even] if [it is] not an actual party.” Id. at 871; see also Meadows Indemnity Co. v. Nutmeg Ins. Co., 157 F.R.D. 42, 45 (M.D. Tenn. 1994) (pre-hearing discovery of non-parties allowed, because the subpoenaed recipients were “intricately related to the parties involved in the arbitration and [were] not mere third-parties who [had] been pulled into this matter arbitrarily”); Festus & Helen Stacy Foundation, Inc. v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce Fenner, & Smith Inc., 432 F. Supp.2d 1375, 1379 (N.D. Ga. 2006) (the FAA impliedly permits arbitrators to order pre-hearing discovery from non-parties). Most of these rulings predate the Hay Group and Life Receivables decisions. As a result, it is an open question whether these courts would rule the same way if the question were presented today.

3. Pre-Hearing Discovery Permitted Based on a Showing of “Special Need”

A middle ground approach forged by the Fourth Circuit, but rejected by the Second Circuit in Life Receivables, applies a balancing test — arbitral orders for pre-hearing discovery of a non-party are enforceable, if the requesting party can demonstrate a “special need or hardship.” COMSAT Corp. v. Nat’l Sci. Found., 190 F.3d 269, 275 (4th Cir. 1999). Although the court declined to define its standard in the abstract, it did require that, “at a minimum, a party must demonstrate that the information it seeks is otherwise unavailable.” Id. at 276.

The circuit split highlights the judiciary’s schizophrenic efforts to mark the outer limits of arbitral powers, or (more specifically) to balance the need to arm arbitrators facing litigation problems with judicial tools, on the one hand, against the bench’s pervasive suspicion that these devices are best left in the charge of judges, on the other. Some of the key benefits to arbitration, including efficiency and economy, would ultimately be jeopardized if arbitrators were permitted to arrogate to themselves complete authority to order any subpoena, deposition, or other discovery without selective but meaningful judicial oversight. Furthermore, limitless subpoena power would permit a panel to reach non-parties who never agreed to participate in the relevant arbitration, and who otherwise have the right to place their objections before judges — instead of being subjected to industry “judges” selected by private entities with interests potentially inimical to their own.

More broadly, and for the same reason, arbitral power to order pre-hearing discovery of third parties may both exceed and stand at odds with the source of a panel’s authority — a private contract that binds only consenting parties. In light of the mixed messages propagated by the courts, arbitrators must consider and manage the tension between their role in “safeguard[ing] the rights of third parties while insuring that there is sufficient disclosure of information to provide for a full and fair hearing.” RUAA at §17, Comment 8 (2000).

C. Imposing Confidentiality

Confidentiality and the technical expertise of industry arbitrators were once considered the hallmarks of “private” arbitration. The benefits of confidentiality are palpable. Sealing the arbitration record may encourage parties to communicate candidly and promote compromise. In addition, confidentiality allows parties to avoid disclosure of their claim handling and payment practices which, in some cases, could invite third parties to seek discovery in an effort to advance their own interests. The veil of confidentiality also arguably prevents honorable arbitration positions — which may, in fact, be driven by the circumstances of a specific case, or by an ongoing business relationship — from being mis-characterized as “corporate positions.” And, absent confidentiality requirements, a third party’s general knowledge of arbitration proceedings and the positions taken therein could unfairly refract public perception of a company, which could (in turn) inhibit its sale of new business. For these reasons, confidentiality provisions are viewed by some as an essential component to the formula that has made arbitration the principal means of resolving formal reinsurance disputes. In fact, some practitioners argue that confidentiality should be considered an implied term of reinsurance agreements (especially older contracts), even if it is not expressly set forth in the parties’ contract.

Most U.S. arbitrations still do remain confidential. In the past half decade, however, some parties and their counsel have selectively withheld their agreement to confidentiality provisions, in an effort to use disclosure as settlement leverage against adversaries who may wish to avoid public scrutiny, including disclosure to business partners (or the reinsurance community, writ large) of the relevant facts or the fact of a dispute itself. Other reasons for eschewing confidentiality may include a party’s wish to rely on a favorable result for its precedential effect in later arbitrations against the same party, or as a means to encourage future opponents to resolve the same issue in their favor. Regardless of their motivation, a small but growing number of disputes turn on the parties’ incompatible wishes with respect to the confidentiality of a reinsurance arbitration, which is typically governed by an arbitration clause that fails to address the issue.

1. Authority To Issue Confidentiality Orders

If only one party wishes to maintain confidentiality, does a panel have the authority to order it? If so, what is the source of that mandate? Although there is little authority available to answer these questions definitively, industry practice, state statutory regimes, and the parties’ express agreement may be (and often are) marshaled in an effort to do so.¹¹

The “customary” U.S. practice is, of course, to maintain the confidentiality of a reinsurance arbitration and the information and testimony created during its pendency. Unless parties can show that prior arbitrations under the relevant contracts were not confidential, “confidentiality” is often viewed as an implied contract term, which is implemented through the issuance of a confidentiality order. The historical industry expectation of confidentiality suggests that, if a party wanted its dispute to be public, it would (and, should) have articulated that predilection in its contract. Absent express terms or a course of dealing to the contrary, most panels will likely continue to interpret reinsurance contracts to include confidentiality provisions. Given the factual nature of a custom and practice inquiry, arbitrators may feel empowered to order confidentiality with little risk that their order will be found to “manifestly disregard” existing law, or that they will have exceeded their powers.¹²

If, however, one party successfully challenges a custom and practice finding, confidentiality mores may not survive judicial review, absent some form of statutory authorization. See, e.g., Nationwide Mut. Ins. Co. v. Randall & Quilter Reins. Co., 2007 WL 2326878, at *2 (S.D. Ohio Aug. 10, 2007). In Randall, the court declined to enforce a panel’s confidentiality order on its own merits. Instead, the order was “simply one factor in the Court’s calculus and not outcome-determinative” with respect to its decision whether to maintain, during a confirmation proceeding, the confidentiality of documents originally produced in arbitration. Id. at *2

The FAA, the UAA and the UNCITRAL Rules are all silent on the subject of confidentiality. The RUAA authorizes arbitrators to preserve confidentiality, but their discretion is not unfettered: “An arbitrator may issue a protective order to prevent the disclosure of privileged information, confidential information, trade secrets, and other information protected from disclosure to the extent a court could if the controversy were the subject of a civil action in this State.” Id. at §17(e) (emphasis supplied). On its face, the RUAA does not confer omnibus authority to seal an entire proceeding, but it does permit an arbitrator to protect specified information. Of course, the focus on specific items invites argument that any unspecified item was not intended to (and cannot) be protected from disclosure. Because most states have not yet adopted the RUAA, formal authorization to order confidentiality in arbitration is not available, unless the relevant arbitration agreement is governed by a state statute that expressly provides for it.¹³

Commercial arbitration codes, to the extent that they may apply, often include only a placeholder for a confidentiality agreement — a state of affairs which may reflect the uncertainty created by challenges to the industry presumption of confidentiality. The ARIAS Practical Guide advises, for example, that confidentiality “should be memorialized in either an agreement by the parties and the Panel, or an order entered by the Panel, setting forth the terms and scope of the confidentiality.” Id. at Ch. 3.8 (2004). Although the Practical Guide intimates that confidentiality orders are appropriate, it refrains from expressly authorizing an arbitrator to impose confidentiality without the parties’ bilateral consent, and it does not identify the source of any such authority.¹⁴ Similarly, while expressly providing that meetings and hearings of the panel are private, the RAA Procedures state only that parties shall use their “best efforts to maintain the confidential nature of the arbitration proceedings and the Award.” RAA Procedures at §7.2 (emphasis supplied). The failure of these commercial codes to address squarely a panel’s authority to issue confidentiality orders may simply reflect the view of the drafters that confidentiality is an implied term of reinsurance agreements.

2. What Is A Party To Do?

Despite the view of some industry players that reinsurance arbitrations should remain confidential, a party may successfully demonstrate that this putative industry practice does not apply to its modern contracts — a plausible scenario given the number of recent entrants into the reinsurance market. Absent agreement of the parties or a statutory mandate, a panel is arguably not inherently authorized to order confidentiality. As one court said: “There is no confidentiality privilege precluding disclosure of the [arbitration] material requested.” Galleon Syndicate Corp. v. Pan Atl. Group, Inc. 223 A.D.2d 510, 511 (1996). A party that wishes to keep its disputes out of the public domain should take care to insert confidentiality provisions in its contracts. If arbitration is brought under a contract that is silent on the issue, the party desiring confidentiality should raise the issue with its opponent in an effort to reach a compromise.

To date, few courts have been called upon to review confidentiality orders issued over one party’s objection — those courts which have addressed the issue have focused on protection of a specific cache of documents, as opposed to the confidentiality of the entire proceeding. E.g., Galleon, 223 A.D.2d at 511. In view of the FAA’s celebrated deference to arbitration, and the widely-held understanding that confidentiality is one of the chief benefits traditionally associated with industry arbitration, most courts will be loath to expose the parties’ dispute to the public without appropriate safeguards.

3. Post-Award Practice

Even if both parties agree that their arbitration is confidential, disclosures often occur at the close of a case when one party moves to confirm or vacate an arbitration award in court. In these instances, despite the existence of a confidentiality order, some facts concerning the arbitration are likely to become a matter of public record. See, e.g., Global Reinsurance Corporation-US Branch v. Argonaut Insurance Company, 2008 WL 1805459 (S.D.N.Y. 2008).

In Global, the court was called upon to seal a petition to confirm an arbitration award. By necessity, such petitions often contain confidential facts disclosed during the arbitration. After balancing the competing considerations and acknowledging that it was a “close question,” the Court concluded that the petition should be sealed. It reasoned:

Arbitration remains a species of contract and, in the absence of some governing principle of law . . . parties are permitted to keep their private undertakings from the prying eyes of others. The circumstance changes when a party seeks to enforce in federal court the fruits of their private agreement to arbitrate, i.e. the arbitration award.... [D]isclosure of the decretal portions of the awards does present the risk that it will impair [a party’s] negotiating position with other reinsurers and that such interest outweighs the public’s right of access.

Global, 2008 WL 1805459, at *1. But see Nationwide Mut. Ins. Co. v. Randall & Quilter Reins. Co., 2007 WL 2326878, at *2 (S.D. Ohio Aug. 10, 2007) (declining to keep arbitration materials under seal where one party voiced no concern regarding injury to its reputation if they became public).

Upon a request for reconsideration by the party seeking disclosure, however, the Court in Global found no evidence that disclosure would cause immediate harm to either party. A party’s reliance “upon its assessment of the danger of a slippery slope that might impair the exchange of information between parties to a reinsurance agreement” was insufficient to overcome the presumption favoring public access. Despite acknowledging that the federal policy supporting arbitration is promoted by imposing confidentiality, the court in Global observed that, “in the ordinary course,” a petition to confirm or vacate an award will not publicize all testimony and documentary evidence that was placed before a panel. Global, 2008 WL 1805459, at *1.

Confirmation and vacation proceedings, however, often deviate from the “ordinary course” adumbrated by the court. The extended arbitration proceedings, and subsequent litigation, between Commercial Union and EMLICO offers a glaring example of the limited protections offered by confidentiality agreements, when one party petitions a court for relief and publicizes the facts of its arbitration in the process. See Commercial Union Ins. Co. v. Lines, 239 F. Supp.2d 351 (S.D.N.Y. 2002), vacated, Commercial Union Ins. Co. v. Lines, 378 F.3d 204 (2d Cir. 2004).¹⁵ In that case, the confidentiality agreement specified that no party was permitted to disclose confidential information to third parties. The panel also issued an order admonishing that “the parties are not to make any further public statements as respects this arbitration other than its existence.” Id. at 357, n.7. The parties could, however, use the documents they exchanged, briefs, memoranda, depositions and transcripts of legal proceedings involving the confirmation, modification or vacation of any award or ruling. Id. at 354, n.4. As in many other cases, the petition and subsequent court decisions described in detail many of the underlying disputed facts, the impetus for the arbitration itself, and the award. See e.g. id. at 354-55.

In sum, even when an arbitration panel issues a confidentiality order, a motion to confirm or vacate its award may also vacate the panel’s confidentiality ruling. In general, the judicial trend is to refuse to seal publicly filed documents. We are now at the confluence of this judicial proclivity and the increased appetite of parties to bring their arbitration proceedings into the courtroom for tactical and other purposes — a crossroads that may irrevocably erode one of the benefits traditionally associated with industry arbitration.

II. CONCLUSION

Industry arbitration has historically provided — and, in the view of many experienced practitioners, continues to provide — an attractive alternative to litigation in many cases. Among the principal benefits participants have enjoyed are the (relatively) free exchange of information; in a confidential forum; under the stewardship of industry professionals, who are empowered to conform suitable relief to the contours of unique and evolving problems. As arbitrations grow in number and the disputed stakes continue to rise, however, these benefits are often mitigated by the quasi-judicial process required to produce an award or other definitive result.

Arbitrators have been invited more frequently to undertake acts of a judicial character, in order to preserve and adapt the benefits of arbitration to this more challenging climate of high-stakes disputes. At the same time, they have been called upon to confront the elephant (or, perhaps, the herd of elephants) in the room — the question whether, in each case, the urged or contemplated, quasi-judicial action is not only warranted but also authorized by the parties’ agreement or by law. In the past, arbitrators were (believed to be) entrusted with broad authority to decide all of the issues before them. The current trend reflecting more frequent resort to judicial review, however, enhances the risk that arbitration rulings issued without express authority will be vacated.

Some traditionally “judicial” acts, including awards of multiple and punitive damages, imposition of interest, and certain kinds of subpoenas are legally authorized undertakings, as long as they are not expressly barred by the applicable arbitration agreement or by state law. Other familiar forms of relief, such as awards of attorney’s fees, are not tools commonly available to arbitration panels, despite their mandate to tailor awards to the circumstances they face. An arbitrator’s power to provide injunctive relief and to impose confidentiality strictures on arbitration proceedings remain unsettled issues, lurking at the margins of authorized action, despite the profound need for clarity.

An unfortunate, but perhaps essential, outgrowth of the search for authorization is the risk that panels may (if only temporarily) be divested of certain powers. Arbitration clauses, of course, often contain disengagement provisions that free reinsurance arbitrators from following strict rules of law. In those circumstances, arbitrators enjoy wider (albeit, not absolute) latitude but, when the parties’ contract specifies only that the law of a particular jurisdiction will govern, arbitrators must exercise caution with respect to their growing responsibilities. They must, for example, be circumspect when it comes to requested or seemingly required extensions of their powers beyond the grant of authority inherent in a private agreement to arbitrate. Some courts and commentators have, as noted above, previously agreed that a panel’s authority to act is limited when the rights of non-parties are implicated by an arbitrator’s order. Parties must, for their part, also be aware of the practical and legal limits of a panel's authority, and it behooves the industry — including trade groups such as ARIAS — to address by rule recurring issues of authority which require significant time and expense to decide time and again.

More broadly, with expanded arbitrator power comes further overlap between arbitration and litigation. As the two processes seemingly grow together, and arbitrations become laden with judicial procedures, arbitration is bound to lose some of its efficiency and, therefore, more than a little of its luster, unless practitioners and trade groups succeed in restoring traditional benefits of arbitration by appropriately calibrating the powers of arbitrators to the goals of parties to industry arbitration.▼

1 Black's Law Dictionary defines "equitable remedy" as: "A remedy, usu. a nonmonetary one, such as an injunction or specific performance, obtained when legal remedies, usu. monetary damages, cannot adequately redress the injury." Id. at 609 (3d pocket ed. 2006). For purposes of this article, the authors consider injunctive relief, including pre-award security orders, to be a species of equitable relief.

2 Few cases reject an arbitrator's power to grant pre-hearing security. But see Recyclers Ins. Group, Ltd. v. Ins. Co. of North America, No. 91-503, 1992 WL 150662 (E.D. Pa. June 15, 1992). In Recyclers, a federal trial court vacated an arbitration panel's order requiring a reinsurer to place $1 million in escrow as security for a possible award against it, finding that the panel had exceeded its authority. The Recyclers court observed that: "arbitrators cannot require a party to post collateral to secure potential liabilities where the parties do not provide the arbitrators with that authority in the agreement to arbitrate." Id. at *4.

Apparently recognizing flaws in this reasoning, the same court confirmed a security order just four years later. See Meadows Indem. Co. v. Arkwright Mut. Ins. Co., No. 88-0600, 1996 WL 557513, at *2 (E.D. Pa. Sept. 30, 1996). In Meadows, the panel ordered a party to post pre-hearing security in the form of a $1.5 million letter of credit. Id. at *1. Although the parties had not expressly authorized the arbitrators to impose pre-hearing security, the agreement authorized letters of credit in other contexts. Id. The court examined the arbitral award deferentially, expressly rejected the Recyclers holding, and concluded that the parties had "empowered the arbitrators to award relief in any reasonable form at any stage in the proceeding." Id. at *4. Ultimately, the court concluded: "the more appropriate rule is that an arbitration award ordering a party to post security before the panel will consider the merits may rationally derive such an award from a contract that does not expressly provide that it may impose such an award." Id. at *7. This is the rule followed by most U.S. courts.

3 The UIPA was promulgated by the National Association of Insurance Commissioners in 1949.

4 At least one state, Illinois, has explicitly included arbitrations in its process statute. See 215 Ill. Comp. Stat. 5/123(5) ("Before any unauthorized foreign or alien company shall file or cause to be filed any pleading in any action or proceeding, including any arbitration..."). Omission of this clause from other state statutes may suggest that they did not intend to extend the statute to arbitrations. Of course, as the balance of this article makes clear, the same omission could simply represent another example of state legislatures failing to account for the complexities of modern arbitration.

5 When a non-party resists an arbitrator's subpoena, the ability to enforce it resides with the courts. As a result, venue and jurisdiction may become significant considerations in the context of establishing the parameters of discovery.

6 "The arbitrators may issue (or cause to be issued) subpoenas for the attendance of witnesses and for the production of books, records, documents and other evidence, and shall have the power to administer oaths." UAA at §7(a) (1955).

7 "An arbitrator may issue a subpoena for the attendance of a witness and for the production of records and other evidence at any hearing and may administer oaths." RUAA at §17(a) (2000).

8 "At any time during the arbitral proceedings the arbitral tribunal may require the parties to produce documents, exhibits or other evidence within such a period of time as the tribunal shall determine." UNCITRAL Arbitration Rules Art. at 24 (1976).

9 "An arbitrator or other person authorized by law to subpoena witnesses or documents may do so upon the request of any party or independently." AAA at R-31(d) (2007).

10 This tactic was previously approved by the Second Circuit, who ruled that it was permissible to subpoena deponents to "appear and testify in an arbitration proceeding," which was scheduled to take place ten months before the merits hearing. See Stolt-Nielsen SA v. Celanese AG, 430 F.3d 567 (2d Cir. 2005). The Second Circuit allowed the subpoenas to stand, concluding that the Act was intended to ensure only that arbitrators be present when a non-party is called to provide information.

11 Some commonwealth countries have advanced national standards either authorizing or prohibiting confidentiality orders in arbitration. For example, Section 10 of the Bermuda International Conciliation and Arbitration Act of 1993 expressly states that arbitration proceedings are available as evidence in any other arbitration or litigation. Section 46 further provides that a court may not make public any part of an arbitration proceeding that a party "reasonably wishes to remain confidential." Id. at §46(b). English courts have held that there is a legal right and duty of confidentiality in arbitration proceedings, although there is a limited exception for awards and the reasoning behind an award, which are sometimes "subject to a qualified right of disclosure." See Graydon S. Staring, Law of Reinsurance §22:6[2] (2008). Australian courts, on the other hand, have found that arbitrators lack the authority to issue orders imposing confidentiality. See, e.g., Charles S. Baldwin, IV, Protecting Confidential And Proprietary Commercial Information In International Arbitration, 31 Tex. Int'l L.J. 451, 482 (1996) (citing Eso Austl. Resources Ltd. v. Plowman (1995) 128 A.L.R. 391, 402, 404 (Austl.)).

12 In practice, it would likely be difficult for a party to establish that a panel of experienced industry professionals "exceeded its powers" by finding that a custom and practice of confidentiality existed in this industry. See FAA, 9 U.S.C. §10(a)(4).

13 A few states have adopted a detailed approach to orders of confidentiality in arbitration. Texas, for example, extends broad confidentiality protection to arbitrations. See Tex. Civ. P. & Rem. Code at §154.073(a)-(b) (West 2008). The Texas statute expressly protects communications made by participants to an arbitration, provides that they may not be used as evidence against the issuer, and states that any record made at an arbitration is confidential. Id. Under Missouri law, all information related to arbitration proceedings is considered confidential, including communications by any participant, arbitrator, or other person present at an arbitration. See Mo. Rev. Stat. at §435.014 (West 2008); Group Health Plan, Inc. v. BJC Health Sys., Inc., 30 S.W.3d 198, 203 (Mo. Ct. App. 2000). In Missouri, protective orders signed by arbitrators (for example) receive the same confidentiality protections as arbitral awards. Id. at 204.

14 The AAA Rules do not directly address the question whether arbitrators have the power to impose confidentiality. Instead they state only that "[t]he arbitrator and the AAA shall maintain the privacy of the hearings unless the law provides to the contrary." AAA Commercial Rule 23.

15 The details of the relevant arbitration proceeding were again set forth in a later decision of the same court. See Commercial Union Ins. Co. v. Lines, 2008 WL 2234634 (S.D.N.Y. May 30, 2008).
